German Maps & Battle Logistics Rooms

The German military during World War II relied heavily on detailed maps and sophisticated logistics to plan and execute their operations. The National Archives hold a collection of German World War II maps that provide a fascinating glimpse into the strategies and movements of the Axis powers. These maps include detailed information on the locations of Allied and Axis forces, as well as the situations faced by the German army at various points during the war.

The logistics rooms, or command centers, were crucial for coordinating these operations. They were equipped with large maps and other tools to help military leaders plan and execute their strategies. The logistics branch of the German Army was responsible for ensuring operational readiness, sustainability, and mobility by providing supplies, maintaining equipment, and managing transportation. This branch played a vital role in supporting the army's operations, ensuring that soldiers had the necessary resources even in challenging conditions.
